Sermon Introduction

We love the beautiful, the winsome, the lovely. Catherine the Great once said, "Unfortunately I could not help listening to him; he was handsome as the dawn." And Aristotle adds, "Beauty is a greater recommendation than any letter of introduction." Much value is placed on beauty.

Having said that, it is also true to say that our world places a great deal of value on image, on how we appear to others. You see evidences of this in various places: the airbrushed photos of celebrities on magazine covers, the carefully thought-through posts on Facebook and Instagram (posts that leave followers thinking, "Wow! I am so inadequate compared to that!"), the frequent times that we shield the truths of our struggles behind an "I'm fine" or an "Everything's great!" or a pasted-on smile. Because, even if we struggle, we want to appear okay to others; we want to seem like everything's fine. But, in our hearts, we know that we're not all that our image often portrays us to be. We're human. We're flawed. We're imperfect.

How are we to relate to such things?

One of the startling realities of Scripture is God's willingness to use imperfect people to carry forward his perfect plan. It would seem that if one were attempting to forward a plan as profoundly vital as the kingdom of God, one would choose lovely people, winsome people, beautiful people as the exclusive transmitters of such a message. But, look at Scripture. It doesn't take long of doing so to realize that God chooses imperfect people. Or, to borrow the title of our current sermon series, Imperfect Believers.

Today we sit by a well with Jesus as we encounter another imperfect believer. What will she teach us?

Randy Roberts
Senior Pastor
