Sermon Introduction

For over two months now, we have been on a journey with Jacob. On this journey, we have covered a fairly significant section of the book of Genesis. And, in the process, we've learned more about Jacob, his family, and the ways of God in his life than we knew before. In fact, while I don't know what it's been like for you, for me, it's been a deeply meaningful journey. I have spent more time studying and learning about Jacob and Jacob's God than I ever have before. And, through this process, Jacob and his God have left their indelible imprint on my life.

Today, one more time, our focus is on Jacob. And today's focus is on the final days of his life. As such, we will not only consider Jacob, but the children that come after him. We will pay attention to whether or not they were faithful to God and healthy in their relationships with each other. We will see whether or not they were more like Jacob in his early life or like Jacob in his later life. Which leads me to the question: Do you suppose it's true that our greatest legacy comes in the people we leave behind? I think parents would agree with that. Teachers would agree with that. Mentors would agree with that. And, I believe, Jacob would agree with that.

Unfortunately, the people that Jacob leaves behind were a troubled group. His sons often fought with, lied to, hid from, and, yes, even killed others (that last one happened in revenge for what was done to their sister). To put it mildly, if Jacob is to be judged by the people he left behind, then the result is not good.

So what lessons are we to draw from Jacob and his intergenerational family? His grandfather Abraham and his father Isaac also contributed to the family's overall legacy. A lingering look at the four generations of this family (Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph and his brothers)—if anything—underlines the need for and the power of God's grace in redeeming even the most troubled family.

It's a message we need to hear again today.

Randy Roberts, Senior Pastor
